A lecture book entry says: "Cadets must at all time keep their hair properly cut, nothing looks more slovenly and unsoldierly than long, untidy hair. There is a barber's shop in the camp."

The collection could fetch £2,000 with his mum and two sisters. He never married and died in 1950.

Mr Stevenson added: "The collection is fascinating. I'm amazed by nine small rolls of gun camera photographs from 1918. But the log book is particularly special and incredibly rare."

Scallop boom after fishing ban

A BAY where all forms of fishing were banned more than a decade ago has seen numbers of king scallops quadruple.

The conservation zone was set up on the island of Arran after fears the area was being fished out.

Experts monitoring marine stocks in Lamlash Bay say the seabed has now recovered from damage caused by trawls and dredges. And they have counted 23 scallops for every 100 square metres, compared with six in 2010. Lobsters are also bigger and more numerous, say members of the eco-group Coast.

Stocks...scallops

Co-founder Howard Wood said: "We have clear evidence that biodiversity in the area is improving."

The bay in the Firth of Clyde was the first zone in Scotland to be assigned no-fishing status by the Edinburgh government.
